Where's the Ocean View?

A Bit of Berkeley History

In the early 1850's there was a small settlement between a stagecoach stop on what is now San Pablo Avenue and Jacob's Landing, a wharf at the end of Delaware Street. It was called Ocean View. The settlement developed into a commercial and industrial center with a grist mill, a soap factory, a blacksmith, an inn and store and a school. Its inhabitants were workers and farmers. It grew slowly around its core at Sixth and Hearst Streets, and was the only center of social life in what was to become Berkeley. It grew from 45 families in 1874 to 130 families 3 years later. Most of Berkeley at that time was farmland. East Berkeley, which was to become the University and Downtown, wasn't populated until the late 1860's. Ocean View and Berkeley came together and incorporated in 1878 to avoid becoming part of Oakland. Ocean View then became known as West Berkeley.

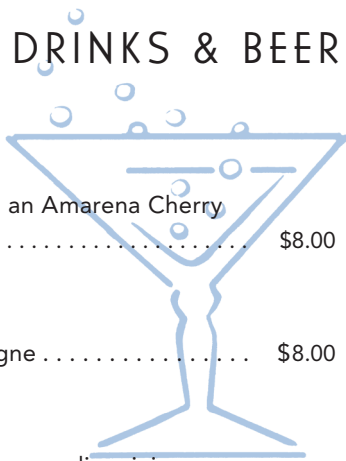

The Fourth Street Shops and the modern commercial era began in the late 1970's, with Bette's opening in 1982.
